Seventeen-year-old Ember Lonergan has made her pack a promise: To go after their enemies before their enemies can come for them. It was a bold statement that she has no idea how to back up. She hasn't mastered driving on the highway, much how to take down a hostile system of government. What's worse, half her pack is crazy, and the other half is broken...possible forever.

But none of that matters anymore. Ember isn't just Ember anymore. Ember and her cousins are the prophesied Trinity, foretold to take down the druids and break the curse that's plagued witches and reapers for centuries. The Oracle has been gathering their allies—laying the groundwork for their return—for decades, but all of that work is destroyed in an instant when Ember's betrayed by somebody she thought she could trust. Alliances are crumbling. Humans are missing. People are dying. The High Inquisitor has arrived. Witches have taken over the school, and they are instituting new policies every day. Their new message is clear: If you fight for the Trinity, you burn with the Trinity.
